"It captivates the attention of the reader with the uncompon spirit and rayety of its dialogue, and its great descriptive power. There is a charm in its delineations of character, which are executed with great skill, and show a true haowledge of the human heart. The scene is laid on the Rhine, but the principal characters are English, most of them, it is stated, being taken from real life. The moral is excellent; the love passages which are numerous, are pure and refined; the conversations are carried on with great vivacity. No one could take up the book without
